About City & Guilds

As the UK's leading vocational education organisation, City & Guilds is leading the talent revolution by inspiring people to unlock their potential and develop their skills. City & Guilds is recognised and respected by employers across the world as a sign of quality and exceptional training.

City & Guilds Group

The City & Guilds Group operates from three major hubs: London (servicing Europe, the Caribbean and Americas), Johannesburg (servicing Africa), and Singapore (servicing Asia, Australia and New Zealand). The Group also includes the Institute of Leadership & Management (management and leadership qualifications), City & Guilds Licence to Practice (land-based qualifications) and Learning Assistant (an online e-portfolio).

1. Introduction

The purpose of this document is to provide centres with feedback on the performance of candidates for 4748-114 and 4748-214 Functional Skills English Writing Level 2. The examinations have been available since September 2019, and this report covers the period from February 2023 to August 2023.

2. Overall performance

This report covers the period from February 2023 to August 2023.

Pass rates indicate that most candidates are well prepared prior to sitting the exam and are able, to a greater or lesser degree, to write responses that meet the Functional Skills English Level 2 requirements.

Each paper requires candidates to write two responses. The purpose, audience and document type are different in each task. There are six document types required at level 2 (an article, a report, a letter, a blog, a narrative and an email), and each has its own format and structure requirements. Many candidates are able to produce these accurately, but weaker candidates often miss significant elements or produce responses that are not formatted in any way.

Many candidates adapt the two responses to suit the purpose and audience of each task. This is not always apparent for weaker candidates. Coherence, cohesion and clarity are qualities that can be seen for many candidates, aided by appropriate language selection, paragraphing and logical sequencing of the responses.

The categories that are particularly well addressed by the vast majority of candidates are the inclusion of relevant detail and producing responses of suitable length. However, some weaker candidates do not always ensure that all bullet points in the question brief are covered and expanded upon. Some weaker candidates write responses with word counts significantly under the guidance, which can result in the loss of marks.

Another area of strong performance is the accurate use of complex sentences. Examiners are looking for a variety of sentence types (simple, compound and complex). The vast majority of candidates are able to successfully use all three sentence types and, crucially for Level 2, show accurate use of complex sentences. However, weaker candidates, whilst generally including some complex sentences, do not always do so with accuracy. Errors that impinge upon the banding for this category include punctuation errors, word order errors, overly long sentences and language selection.

An issue that affects some weaker candidates is not providing any context for the reader. There is sometimes an assumption that the intended recipient has knowledge of the task.

Spelling, punctuation and grammar cause the loss of marks for many candidates. Typically, those who do not reach the pass mark are weak in at least two of the three categories.

Punctuation errors are often frequent, with comma use being perhaps the most problematic area for many candidates.

Most candidates complete both tasks within the allocated one hour and twenty minutes, although it is apparent at times that the division of time across the two tasks is not always equal. On occasion, candidates are under the impression that only one response is required.

As the pass mark is invariably above 50%, it is not possible to pass the exam if only one response is submitted.

For those candidates who sit the paper-based version, legibility can sometimes be an issue. In addition, it is not always possible to tell that a candidate has accurate control over the use of lower case and upper case letters. For example, it is not uncommon to see upper case letters in the middle of a word. Whilst this may be simply the candidate's handwriting, it is important that the correct formation of letters is evident, as errors will be penalised.

Centres are reminded that Functional Skills English is a summative exam that should be taken only when candidates are sufficiently prepared and have demonstrated success when sitting practice papers.

3. Areas for development

1. Format and Structure

At level 2, candidates are asked to write two different text types. Those text types could be a narrative, a report, a blog, an article, a letter or an email. Candidates should be familiar with the format and structure requirements of each type of document, and centres are strongly urged to review the requirements of each in the updated Guidance for Delivery document.

A report seems to pose problems for many candidates. Once again, centres are urged to review the Guidance for Delivery document. A report does not require any aspects of a letter to be included. Often candidates start the report with Dear Sir, or something similar, and conclude with Yours sincerely. These are not appropriate in a report. Examiners are looking for a clear title to the report, followed by other structural elements such as subheadings, for example.

A formal letter is one of the document types that candidates may be asked to write. It is evident that many candidates struggle to format and structure a letter following accepted conventions, often omitting a sender's or recipient's address, or using inappropriate valedictions to known or unknown recipients.

A narrative is also a requirement. Examiners look for a title, an appropriate introduction to the 'story', additional paragraphs and an attempt to bring the response to a natural and obvious conclusion.

Candidates can be asked to write a blog. A blog is generally a more informal document type, so language should be adapted accordingly. The extent of informality can be determined by the intended audience and purpose, which will always be specified in the question brief. Examiners are looking for a title, an introduction, logical sequencing of information, a conclusion and paragraphing. A blog may also include other structural elements if appropriate, such as subheadings or bullet points.

Formal emails are also required at Level 2, and although an email template is provided, this is not always fully completed by weaker candidates. In addition to the recipient's email address and the subject of the email being completed, examiners are also looking for an appropriate salutation, a suitable introduction, the body of the email, an appropriate conclusion, an appropriate valediction and the name of the sender.

Centres should note that the strict rules around signing off a formal letter with either Yours faithfully or Yours sincerely do not apply to an email, where a greater variety of sign offs are accepted, such as Kind regards, or Best wishes, for example.

The final document type that may be asked for is an article. Weaker candidates often omit a title. Centres are reminded that all articles require a title, paragraphing, logical sequencing of information and an appropriate conclusion.

All level 2 document types require paragraphs, but it is not uncommon to see responses devoid of paragraphs.

2. Language

Candidates should understand the need to adapt register and word choice depending on the audience that is being addressed and the type of document being written. A blog aimed at fellow students and a brief report of an incident should have different registers, yet it is apparent that weaker candidates are not always able to differentiate or are simply not familiar with the language requirements of the different text types and audiences.

Candidates are strongly advised to take note of the intended audience and the purpose of the task, and to use that information to inform their writing.

Language marks are not only awarded based on register and word choice. At times, weaker candidates' language is such that incorrect or clumsy expressions are used. Markers differentiate between language errors and grammar errors, so incorrect tense choice, for example, would be penalised under grammar. However, incorrect or clumsy expression is always penalised under language. An example of incorrect language would be, "I am writing to complain on my purchase." The correct expression is 'to complain about'. An example of poor or clumsy language use is continually starting a sentence with the word And so, or creating overly-long sentences by using conjunctions where a full stop would be more appropriate.

3. Coherence

All papers provide a scenario that gives context to the text to be written. Candidates should write their responses as if the reader (the intended audience as specified in the brief and the examiner) does not know that context. Some weaker candidates' responses assume knowledge on behalf of the intended audience, whereas in reality the reader would be baffled by what they were reading.

As an example, a candidate might be asked to write a formal email. It is important that the candidate's response makes clear at the beginning why the reader is receiving the email. Similarly, any response should be drawn to a conclusion in an appropriate way to provide additional coherence.

These are by no means the only requirements when ensuring coherence in a response. Clarity of thought, paragraphing, planning an argument (if appropriate), logical sequencing, making use of discourse markers, referencing previous paragraphs and maintaining a consistent voice are just some of the other methods examiners are looking for.

4. Cohesion

Candidates should be aware of the many grammatical devices that can be used to give a response cohesion. The cumulative effect of these devices, combined with clarity of thought, paragraphing and logical sequencing, for example, impact upon the effectiveness of the response in conveying its message and successfully addressing its intended audience.

Simple discourse markers that link different parts of the text, the accurate use of pronouns, reference words, substitution and ellipsis are some of the more common ways in which candidates can demonstrate cohesion.

All question briefs provide candidates with a set of bullet points outlining the detail that should be addressed within the response. Some candidates, when addressing each bullet point, are unable to create any sort of connection between the points being made and fail to use any devices that lend the response cohesion. This can result in a response that seems disjointed and does not present a unified whole. The use of relatively simple cohesive devices can rectify this situation.

5. Number of responses required

All exam papers contain two questions and require two responses. A surprising number of candidates entered only one response, and time available did not appear to be the factor influencing this. Centres should note that it is not possible to pass if completing only one of the two tasks, as the pass mark is invariably set above 50% of the available marks.

6. Detail and length

A suggested word count is provided for each question and candidates should endeavour to write a response that is roughly the same length as the suggested word count. If a piece is unduly short, it will usually impact upon the functionality of the response and the marks awarded.

On occasion, some candidates attempt only one response. Each paper has two questions, both of which should be completed. As the marks available are distributed evenly across both responses, and the pass mark is invariably set above 50% of available marks, it is not possible to pass the exam by completing only one response.

The tasks will always include a bullet point list outlining the points that should be expanded upon in the response. Candidates should make sure that each has been covered sufficiently so that full marks can be credited for inclusion of relevant detail. Candidates should also consider the functionality of the response in terms of relevant detail. If, when writing a letter and requesting a response, for example, the omission of their own address affects the functionality of the letter, this will be taken into account by the examiners.

Responses that are significantly longer than the suggested word count are not penalised on length, but candidates should be aware that all tasks can be fully addressed within the suggested word count. For weaker candidates, producing significantly longer responses increases the likelihood of errors occurring.

7. Planning

Candidates are encouraged to plan their responses, but they should be aware that planning is not marked and does not contribute directly to the marks awarded. However, good planning should increase the likelihood of higher marks.

At times, some candidates seem to write out an entire draft of the final response. This is ineffectual planning and a waste of precious time.

8. Punctuation

Punctuation is an area where many candidates lose marks, particularly for incorrect use of commas. The standards now specify that candidates should be able to use punctuation that goes beyond sentence demarcation, including using commas to separate clauses. In addition, candidates should be able to correctly use apostrophes for both possession and omission.

On occasion, candidates presented response devoid of punctuation. Candidates should be reminded that punctuation is required irrespective of the type of document being written, and that significant errors or a lack of punctuation can impact upon other categories of marking, such as clarity and coherence and the accurate formation of complex sentences.

Comma use is particularly problematic for many candidates. Centres are reminded that commas are part of the level 2 requirements. Examiners look for instances of correct usage of commas. This may be in lists, when marking the division between clauses in complex sentences, to introduce and/or end direct speech, in addresses (consistency of use rather than an absolute requirement), to aid clarity, etc.

Candidates are awarded between zero and four marks for punctuation. To achieve more than one mark, examiners look for evidence of punctuation use that goes beyond simple sentence demarcation (ie, a capital letter to start a sentence and an appropriate punctuation mark to end the sentence). If there is no evidence of this, the maximum mark for punctuation is one mark. Suitable evidence includes commas, apostrophes, capital letters for proper nouns, brackets, hyphens, colons, semi-colons, etc. Examiners look at both the errors and the correct usage and then allocate marks accordingly.

Apostrophes to indicate possession or omission are a requirement at level 2. Typical errors include using an apostrophe for a simple plural, placing the apostrophe in the wrong place in a contraction, or omitting the apostrophe entirely when it is required to indicate possession.

9. Spelling

Centres are reminded that Entry Levels 1-3 specify words that should be spelt correctly. Whilst no such lists exist for levels 1 and 2, the lower-level requirements are subsumed into the higher levels and are indicative of the minimum levels of spelling that are required at the higher levels. Therefore, candidates should be familiar with these requirements.

Examiners are looking for the use of language appropriate to the task and audience but expect Level 2 candidates to be regularly using ambitious words, specialist words in the given context and words with irregular spellings. There is also the expectation of correct spelling of words required at all levels below level 2.

Common errors noted by examiners include the following words:

business, community, environment, available, communication, accommodation, access, suitable, through, though, thought, bought, definitely, experience, excellent, competition, knowledge, equipment, maintenance, committee, opposite, enough, centre, especially, address, difficult, guard, guarantee, remember.

10. Grammar

Subject-verb agreement and verb-tense agreement are common areas that require development. Word order and other sentence construction errors often impact the marks awarded for grammar. An issue for a significant number of candidates is the omission of definite and indefinite articles. Candidates should be aware that the omission of articles on numerous occasions is not treated as a single error.

When writing a narrative, a common trait amongst weaker candidates is to display inconsistency in tense selection, often moving from present tense to past tense within the same sentence or paragraph when it is not appropriate to do so. Whilst it is appropriate at times for tenses to vary within a sentence or paragraph, some weaker candidates fail to maintain a consistency in the writer's voice when recording the events of a narrative.

Some homophone and close homophone errors are treated as grammar errors. They are: their/they're/there, your/you're, were/where/we're, been/being and our/are.

In addition, other errors treated as grammar errors include using could of or could off instead of could have (plus variations such as would, should etc), using the incorrect form of the indefinite articles a and an, omitting any words in a sentence, errors made in singular nouns ending in the letter y, such as family, that should be in the possessive form but are written in the plural form, for example families instead of family's, and inadvertent repetition of words, for example 'The the weather is changeable.'

11. Proofreading

Candidates should be encouraged to proofread their work, checking for errors in spelling, punctuation, grammar and the composition elements of the qualification, such as coherence, register, structure, format and paragraphing.

4. Advice for centres

1. Candidates should only be entered into the exam once sufficient learning has taken place. In order to maximise the chances of success, candidates should have previously made use of sample papers and model answers, as these will not only give an indication of candidates' progress but will also ensure they are familiar with the types of question that may be asked.
2. An updated Guidance for Delivery document is available on the City & Guilds website. This is essential reading for all tutors or other support staff involved in the delivery of Functional Skills English, as it provides further detail about the Subject Content Statements, examples of the types of scenarios that may be presented and sample teaching activities.
3. Centres are strongly urged to refer to the previous Chief Examiner's reports, as the information and advice are still applicable.
4. Centres are reminded that dictionaries and spellcheckers are no longer permissible for Functional Skills English Writing exams.
5. Centres should refer to the lists of Entry Level (1-3) words provided in the Functional Skills English Subject Content document issued by the Department for Education. These tables should be used to inform the teaching of the spelling requirements at Level 2 and to give some guidance as to the level of spelling that is required.
6. Some candidate's responses were significantly longer than the indicated word count. Whilst this is not penalised per se, the likelihood of more errors occurring is increased for many candidates. All questions are designed so that they can be fully answered within the given word count. Centres are reminded that responses significantly below the given word count may well be penalised across several marking categories.
7. Candidates will always be asked to write two responses, and each response will be of a different document type and directed at a different audience. Centres should ensure candidates are familiar with all the format and structure requirements (outlined in the Guidance for Delivery) of the following document types: a narrative; a blog; a report; an article; a letter; an email.
8. Effective planning of a response should ensure a higher mark is awarded, so how to plan should form part of all candidates' learning programmes. Many candidates either neglect this activity or write out a draft of the entire response. However, centres are reminded that there is no absolute need to show planning and no marks are awarded for planning.
